

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantala Jammu

Of Gods, Men & Militants

CC-O. Agamnigam Digital Preservation Foundation

Dr K L Chowdhury

OF GODS, MEN AND MILITANTS

Dr K L Chowdhury

MINERVA PRESS
NEW DELHI
MIAMI LONDON SYDNEY

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalab Jammu
OF GODS, MEN AND MILITANTS
Copyright © K L Chowdhury 2000

All Rights Reserved

No part of this book may be reproduced in any form by photocopying or by any electronic or mechanical means, including information storage or retrieval systems, without permission in writing from both the copyright owner and the publisher of this book.

ISBN 81 7662 116 1

First Published 2000 by
MINERVA PRESS
13 Palam Marg
Vasant Vihar
New Delhi – 110 057

Printed & bound in India for Minerva Press (India) Pvt. Ltd.

OF GODS, MEN AND MILITANTS

Om bhoorbhuvah swaha Tatsaviturvarenyam bhargo devasya dhimahi Dhiyo yo nah prachodayat

May there be peace in mortal, immortal and divine planes. I meditate on the brilliant splendour of the Sun God. May He stimulate our intellect and drive away ignorance.

Gayatri Mantra

For Dhan Rani, my mother - the fountainhead Leela, my wife - the inspiration My family and friends - the encouragement Kashmir, my homeland - the agony India, my country - the soured dream and Nausheen, and Aditya, my grandchildren - the hope

Acknowledgement

I am grateful to Neeraj for the sketch that has caught the spirit of the poem 'Plaint to Kheerbhawani' and to Anil Nakhasi for his two pencil drawings included in this book. They are from the new generation of promising Pandit artists in exile.

My blessings and love to my daughter Renuka, my younger brother Surrinder and his daughter Tara for typesetting the poems in their personal computers.

Preface

A brief historical background is in order to introduce this work, which is an expression of my experiences of the last violent decade in Kashmir.

Having failed through three major wars to annex the state of Jammu and Kashmir, Pakistan hatched a low intensity proxy war by fuelling insurgency in the state. She cashed on the religious sentiments of its Muslim youth and provided them incentives to cross over to training camps in that country for religious indoctrination and instruction in subversion and guerrilla warfare. During the years 1986-1990 thousands of these trained youth were pushed back in batches as warriors (Mujahids) and equipped with sophisticated arms and lethal ammunition to wage a war of 'liberation' (Jihad) under the command of numerous terrorist outfits remote-controlled in Pakistan. The 'Jihad' started with threats, abduction, torture and killing of the minority Hindus of the Kashmir valley (the Kashmiri Pandits), who were forced to flee. It resulted in the exodus of nearly three hundred and fifty thousand people into the neighbouring province of Jammu and the plains of India in the first half of 1990. Meanwhile, death and destruction continued in the valley, the armed bands burning down educational institutions, bridges and vital communications, looting, vandalising and burning the leftover properties of Pandits, enforcing Islamic diktat on the masses and holding civil servants to ransom in order to run the administration by proxy.

Soon what was believed to have started as a freedom movement degenerated into a massive operation of loot, extortion and rape. The majority of Kashmiri Pandits having fled, the guns were now turned towards the moderates amongst Muslims and the common village folk. Their initial enthusiasm and support for militancy cooled off as the Mujahids who started as their heroes showed their true colours as they indulged in a relentless spree of plundering forests, looting properties, collecting forced donations from the salaries and earnings of every working person, coercing people to enlist their young boys for training in the camps, and demanding their unwed girls in matrimony. As a vested interest developed in militancy, new power equations evolved and foreign mercenaries were pumped in to fill the vacuum created by the capture, surrender and death of 'local militants' in internecine battles and counter insurgency operations. In spite of some containment of militancy, the militant groups have expanded their field of operations into Jammu with their hit and run tactics of causing bomb blasts in busy bazaars, bus stands and railway stations and the selective killings of Hindus in remote villages, the militants entrenching themselves in inaccessible dense forests.

These poems written during the last ten years.

have been arranged in three sections. The first section unfolds the rise of militancy in Kashmir which was touted as the bastion of Hindu Muslim amity and the epicentre of cultural synthesis (Kashmiriyat) and religious tolerance. The Pandits and their gods are under attack as the Muslim fundamentalists seek to cleanse the valley of 'infidels', creating terror, charge sheeting them for treason, exhorting the masses to revolt and throw them out of their homeland.

The second section describes the exodus and the rootlessness of exile; the hurt, trauma and anguish of an itinerant existence away from home; the haunting memories of the past and the present persecutions; the vulnerability of life and the spectre of death in the refugee camps. Their preoccupation with the search for their roots and their gods and the mental debate as to whether they failed their gods or the gods failed them is an ongoing process of self-appraisal with the Pandits. The crisis of identity on the one hand and the attempts to re-create the lost paradise on the other is part of the unfolding moral, psychological and spiritual struggle that goes on side by side with the struggle for day to day survival in exile.

The third section depicts the urge to reclaim the roots as hope kindles with the reports of containment of terrorism coupled with the conciliatory postures of Muslims in the valley and as visitors from there bring the nostalgia of homeland to the Pandits in exile.

The poem 'Arrival', capturing the images while

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalah Jammu on his travels to his exiled relatives in India, is authored by Dr Robin Chowdhury, my brother, living in Australia. I could not resist the urge to include it in my collection here and 'On Your Arrival' is my response to his sentiments.

The poems bear the date (or month) and the place of writing. Because of arrangement in three sections some poems written on an earlier date appear later or vice versa, but the poems in each section follow a chronological order.

K L Chowdhury
Jammu – May 2000

Contents

Section I

The Gathering Storm

The Mists of Siva	17
Caged Goddess	19
The Battle Cry of Jihad	21
Civil Curfew	24
The Martyrdom of Pandit Tikkalal	26
19 January 1990	28
Execution	30
The Hizeb Credo	32
Declaration of Non-allegiance	33
The Score is Equal	35
Witness to a Massacre	36
Siege of Kralkhod	37
The Charge Sheet	39
Sieve	41
Plaint to Kheerbhawani	43
Farewell	45

Section II

Exodus and Exile

A Hundred Kilometre Tunnel of Fear	49
Lamentation	51
The Burning Pyre	54
Identity	56
To Kashmir	58
Twin Shame	59
Dried Offerings	60
Dole	63
Camp School	65
The First Right to Forcible Seizure	67
Testimony	69
A Space to Die	70
Drought	72
Lovesick	73
Ode to an Amaltas	74
Saga of the Student	76
Arda Shankara	78
Funeral of a Monkey	80
Devotion Gone Overboard	82
Invocation	84
Kashmir – Lust for Savagery	86
Paush Amavasya Night	88
Frankenstein Monster	90

Journey Into the Land of the Exiled	92
On Your Arrival	96
Status Change	98
Promises	100
P. S. O.	101
Dyed in the Same Colour	103
26 January 1997	105
Sangrampora	106
The Religion of Killers	107
The Colour of Blood	108
Premium on Death	110
Death Threat	112
Wandhama	113
Exile	115
Need for an Identity	117

Section III

The Call of Roots
Sanctum Sanctorum	121
Homeland	122
The Spirit Does Not Accept Exile	123
Floral Adoration	125
Magnolia	127
Re-creation	129
Celestial Bridge	131

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalab Jammu
Proxy Prayer	132
Reconciliation	134
The Kindling	136
Quantum Leap	138
Time	140
Mauj Kasheer	141
What Unites Us	143
Nausheen	145
Pride of a Nation	147
It is Now	148
Aditya	151
Glossary	153

Section I
The Gathering Storm

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalab Jammu

The Mists of Siva

The mists dance around you four seasons through Lord Siva,
ensconced in your stone temple on top of the Shankaracharya hill rechristened Suleiman by the fervent faithful.

The mists play hide-and-seek as they alternately cover and lay bare mortar, metal, brick and concrete hauled up to build houses on the torso of this hill for ministers and mandarins.

The mists tantalisingly course where the contours fall apart as we bore and blast a spiral road and parking lot for motor traffic up to the hill top.

The mists gently glide and slide as they deftly seek to hide the ravages of the security guards littering this sacred hill with eggshells, empty bottles, phlegm and excess, while they guard you,

Lord Siva.

The mists play the cosmic dance while they come to mediate fresh disputes for ownership of this strip of temple land as adherents of the other faith claim to have dug up evidence of a tomb's existence, and fears gain currency of a Mahabharata breaking out not only in the valley but also on this small mount.

Srinagar - March 1988

Caged Goddess

We feel let down goddess Zeystha as our roles reverse and it is our turn to protect you and thwart wanton designs of idol lifters and iconoclasts on the prowl in our land.

We build you a cage and have to make do with a latticed darshana as the iron bars criss-cross your visage in the rising sun's rays.
But that seems to us a half measure at best, as the zealots seek other ways to carry you away, and we move you to a safer place of an iron vault in a sealed room with security on guard!
Yet the fear lurks in our minds of the guards turning conspirators and joining hands with the abductors.

Is there a way out of this distress, our protectress, except for you to become un-manifest and repair to the bosom of this spring, (from where, aeons back you didst rise to rule our hearts) and bide your time to reincarnate till we settle scores, in this accursed valley of ours?

Srinagar - April 1988

The Battle Cry of Jihad

Time - autumn of the year 1989

Scene - Precincts of a medical institution in Srinagar, Kashmir.

First speaker:

Fellow medics, students, doctors, nurses, residents, technicians and attendants, ambulance drivers, gatekeepers, of Azadi - all soldiers.

Let us to the mosque, to the prayer,
the Friday sermon,
hear, hear.

Come hurry, your work can stay, the patients are not running away, praise be to Allah,
the all-merciful,
the eternal healer, Lailahi -illallah!

Second speaker:

Welcome ye faithful, chosen worshippers, true believers of Islam - all soldiers.

Gird up your loins, comrades-in-arms, unite for the holy Jihad, let us in this domain usher in God's reign, the true Nizame Mustafa, Lailahi-illalah!

Third speaker:

Forward brave Mujahid youth, destroy this evil, forsooth, take the suffering in its stride, all sacrifice is but trite for the noble cause divine, as much yours as mine.
Success knocks at the door, else martyrdom and heaven, for sure.

Fourth speaker:

Cleanse this land once for all of the usurper, the polluter, the infidel, the informer, the Dale Batta and Batten, symbols and agents of Bharat that erode our Kashmiryat.
Follow them to their working place, kick them out of your grace, hound them out of this place, wipe out their every trace.

Chorus:

KP go back.
Indian dogs go back.
Sikhs and Muslims are brothers, wherefore all others?

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalab Jammu
This land is ours.
Islam Zindabad!
Pakistan Zindabad!
Praise be to Allah,
Lahilaha-illalah!

Srinagar - September 1989

Civil Curfew

They call it the civil curfew, civilian groups enforcing it on fellow civilians, by word of mouth,
a decree from the mosque, or a diktat through the newspaper, a day and night curfew on one pretext or the other... the Pakistan day today, that is sought to inspire; tomorrow, the Indian independence day, a black day for ever;
and a day to look forward to, the Kashmir day, the day after!
The martyr's day yesterday, in memory of the mujahideen; and the day before, a protest day, against the police crackdown.
There are the Fridays too-the Friday before and the Friday after...
The civil curfew keeps repeating at the behest of militant groups-the Hizeb-ul-mujahidin today, the Harkat-ul-ansar tomorrow, the Hurriyat the day after and others waiting their turn, vying with each other.
The hapless citizens see no end, nor does anyone dare

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalab Jammu
to call off the curfew, so the civilians too declare a curfew against the civil curfew.
Pray when will the curfew clear?

Srinagar - September 1989

The Martyrdom of Pandit Tikkalal

Sir, did you hear,
Tikkalal is dead.
Tikkalal Tapiloo, sir,
the Jan Sangh fellow,
the Pandit leader,
the petty pleader.

Yes sir,
he has been shot like a dog right near his house while on his way to the law courts.

But why do you turn pale, sir, at the death of one Tikkalal when day after day scores of Mujahid youth are gunned down in their noble pursuit for Nizame Mustafa.

You need not panic, sir, nor fear the revolution, for it is decreed that all Pandits will be safe as long as they pay heed and do not dare or dream to work against the 'cause' but quietly join the mainstream.

Don't you think, sir, that a good-for-nothing fellow like that braggart Tapiloo, had to pay the price, sooner or later, for opening his mouth rather wide.

After all, sir, he was nothing more than a self-proclaimed rhetor of the RSS gospel and I wonder if Pandits ever acknowledge a leader or honour a pal least so Tikkalal, the funny old Tikkalal.

Srinagar - 13 September 1989

19 January 1990

On that fearful night I happened to be a thousand kilometres away from the blitz and bluster, but when I recall the distress phone call of my horror-stricken sister who let me hear through her speaker the cantankerous uproar from a thousand loudspeakers and more hoisted atop the mosques that rent the valley exhorting the faithful to come out of their homes and throng the streets for a Jihad, to drive the infidels out, banish the Pandit males and subdue their females, I plug my ears to shut off the echo as I still shudder with the reverberations of that cacophony of religious frenzy which sent three hundred and fifty thousand of my faith marching from their homes into the Indian plains.

They say, ever since, the ghosts of that holocaust night

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalab Jammu
stalk the length and breadth of my homeland
and the big bang of that mob outcry still re-echoes from hill and dale like a curse.

Execution

Three brazenly blustering youth stormed into Azad colony on that grim wintry afternoon and in a swift operation two staked out near the door while the third, brandishing a gun, forced into the Pandit house and fished out their only son.

Terror-stricken, the neighbourhood watched from behind the window blinds while the helpless family begged and cried as they shoved him into an automobile and sped fast through the lanes.
'Routine questioning,' they yelled as their victim grovelled and struggled.

From what people had heard and seen of 'routine' interrogation by the mujahideen we could hardly believe our eyes when he returned at eventide, and the whole mohalla – Muslims and Pandits – kissed and hugged him in felicitation and showered peanuts, dates and candy in a traditional demonstration.

'These mujahid youth,' a neighbour claimed,
'go by that strict code of discipline not to abduct, torture or kill unless when driven by reason to haul up an agent or informer or one suspected of treason.

They are no terrorists indeed as some make them out to be or they would not have set him free and acquitted him honourably.'

But in the dead of the following night they swooped on the house once again and the next morning his body was found side by side with that of a female with signs of torture and bullet holes and a note staked into their breasts—'Beware the wages of sin.'

'It seems the righteous warriors,' the neighbour was forced to conclude 'must have gathered fresh evidence of this irreligious alliance between two persons of different faiths, and punished them in accordance with their scrupulous ordinance.'

Srinagar - 10 February 1990

The Hizeb Credo

The Pandit cowards are known to get incontinent even at the distant scent of an adversary or opponent; why waste your bullets, why cause needless bloodshed when hands can be used instead?

We need to spare the guns for the bigger battles against the heathens.

Look how the chicken-hearts vent their spleen at the very name Hizeb-ul-mujahideen.

Strangle one and scare and scatter a dozen.

Srinagar - 14 February 1990

Declaration of Non-allegiance

Be it known that I and my family disclaim all allegiance whatsoever to any political party, State or Central, and that we forswear any link that we or our ancestors might have had even remotely ever with any group or organisation that works against the revolution.

We further solemnly aver to distance ourselves for ever from any adverse political views and atone for any sins of misunderstanding, pain or distress caused by word, deed or conduct from sheer oversight or ignorance.

We also notify and declare through the columns of this paper that we would never dare even to consider being a member of any group, subversive or under-cover, that operates for the enemy to undermine the cause so dear; and that we will guide our life through struggle, strife and care

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalab Jammu
on the shining trail blazed by the brave mujahideen and volunteer to offer any sacrifice that falls in our share.

Srinagar - signed by Z and family on 23 February 1990

The Score is Equal

What is the score today?
Four, they say.
Pray, who are they?
Two Mujahideen – went down fighting the Indian war machine.
And the other two?
Need you imagine who – Pandits, it is true, agents and informers, brought to justice by our brave warriors.
The score is equal then?
Yes, two martyrs against two conspirators.
No Indian dogs?
Come don't dismay, Inshallah, in heaps tomorrow, if not today.

Srinagar - March 1989

Witness to a Massacre

There is a cemetery at Omaha beach near the sea.

There is another seven thousand feet above here, under a mountain lea.

At Omaha, near the sea, lie buried nine thousand and seven eighty-three, who fought the war gloriously laying down their lives for their country.

Here at Pahalgam
under the mountain lea, in an undeclared war there has been a killing spree of a whole pinewood.
The neatly sawn stumps of every tree stand in rows on their graves underneath as a mute testimony to the brutal tyranny not of Hitler or Mussolini but of criminals at large from amongst you and me.

Srinagar - March 1990

Siege of Kralkhod

As the cawing crows darkened the sky in their flight back home to roost and the mynahs chirped and squabbled to settle in the eaves for the night, somewhere in midtown Srinagar a shouting horde of near three hundred descended on ancient Kralkhod.

The slogan-mongering menacing crowd in pherons, mufflers, blankets skullcaps, helmets, turbans kangris, lathis and handguns dashed in different directions and some more took up positions.

While the Vitasta flowed its meandering course and the muezzin from the nearby mosque beckoned the believer to the evening prayer they rounded up from the neighbourhood Pandit families that had withstood the threats to run away for good.

Pushed and herded into a compound walled with houses all around and the exit to the entrance lane blocked by a ramshackle barricade were a hundred and fifteen souls male and female; young and old, shaking with fear, shivering with cold.

They were charged to stand there in that cramped yard, wet and bare, and warned of lashing, bashing and death unless they recited the scripture and chanted Allah-o-Akbar till the early morning hour.

Infants tugged at their mothers' breasts, little kids kicked and cried in terror, the old and the infirm could barely mutter, while the others were left with little choice but to recite loud and clear for the whole of Kralkhod to hear, Allah-o-Akbar, Allah-o-Akbar.

The Pandits pitched their voices right and the chorus progressed into the night as the sneers of the zealots and their jeers yielded slowly to cheers and tears and the militant crowd chose to disperse leaving behind a few warriors to see it run to the appointed hour when the muezzin called the morning prayer.

The chants died down at daybreak and the released captives limped away but that was the last we heard of them.
Kralkhod weeps for its inhabitants, for its centuries-old descendants, who never returned to their waiting homes but were forced to become 'migrants'.

Srinagar - 16 March 1990

The Charge Sheet

O, you fugitive Pandit, you Batta migrant, wandering like a vagrant, why do you run away, your motherland to betray, that waits for deliverance from cruel Indian governance?

Lured by Jagmohanace infidel, arch villain-to those plains of dust and sand and the promised plots of land, for petty doles, cash and kind, leaving the tyrannised Muslims behind canon-fodder to Indian guns, to be bombed out of existence.

You betrayers of Azadi, chicken hearts and cowards, flying like frightened birds to those pigeon holes spurning all that is dear, cheating your Mauj Kasheer.

Together we had lived and suffered, together we should have persevered, and fighting side by side, accepted death in its stride
for the noble cause divine
that frees us from the Indian swine.

when we are with you here, nor get a scare by a few threatening letters, phone calls, or warning posters or when taken away in fetters for a little interrogation if only to clear the notion that you have something to hide and are not bona fide;
and if your kin get killed, throttled, drowned, hanged or peeled for being unholy members of CBI, RSS, RAW, moles and informers agent provocateurs.

If you had a clean record why run away of your own accord to spread lies about us besmirching Azadi thus.

Mischief-mongers, self-seekers, deceivers, double-dealers, with your renewed treachery you hatch another conspiracy to carve out a place from our land you dare call your Homeland?

As the revolution reaches every door, Inshallah in a few months more, Nizame-Mustafa as of yore will be here once more.

Srinagar - April 1990

Sieve

How do you suppose I can record the impressions of these violent times when every bullet that maims or kills punches a hole in my soul which by now is like a net cast in a river in flood with innocent blood?

Srinagar - April 1990

Plaint to Kheerbhawani

In the company of ancient chinars that sage-like in meditation stand and seated in the midst of the Spring, you reign supreme, Mother Kheerbhawani, as the river Sindhu sends a stream to skirt round you in reverential embrace, and hallows this piece of chosen land where countless foreheads bend in delight, of your devotees sanctified.

Little earthen lamps dance around you in bright sunshine and evening hue, be it summer or freezing winter, the chants resound, the hymns pervade, the conchs sing, the bells ring.

We deck you in flowers of all hues, of all seasons - reds, whites, and blues - the hyacinth and the chrysanthemum, vena, pansy and lotus, guelder-rose and narcissus, marigolds, lilies and the rest.

We flock to you day after day, and every eighth day of the moon, when you are at your best, most benevolent and kindest, we wash your feet with our tears and bathe you in ambrosia,

Gandhi Memorial College of Education, Bantala, Jammu

sweeten your spring with candy cakes, and with our most prized apparel, sweep the floor round the Octagon, as in wonder, awe and admiration we watch your changing moods, transforming the colours of the Spring that symbolise our destiny, from turquoise to sapphire blue, Nabadi to emerald green, amber yellow to rose pink – heralds of peace, plenty and joy - and at times the red of war or the frightful black that presages death.

But now the clamour, cacophony, and curse drown the chants, hymns, and verse as the fanatics rave and rage and open the barrels of their guns on your loving daughters and sons.
Why don't you arise and strike rather than stand there sphinx-like, why doesn't the Spring turn blood-red to signal war on the tyrant, why doesn't it change to pitch-black and chase evil from its track?

Srinagar - April 1990

Farewell

It was only a matter of time for me and my family to leave the town and run away, but that tell-tale threatening letter that I was served yesterday helped me to decide without delay and fix tomorrow, the first of May, as the departing day.

Left with a single day, we ask each other,
is there a better way than to spend it together, this warm spring day, in our garden here,
as a mark of farewell?

As we sit and stroll and admire and extol the lineage of each plant and tree how spontaneously each member of the family picks up one implement or the other and sets to work furiously.

We mow the lawn,
trim the bushes, turn the soil in the flower-beds, water the pansies and the phlox, fondle the flowers and the buds, spruce and sweep and strew the fertiliser, here, there, and everywhere.

Is this flurry of activity, this spontaneity in the family, the last rite of a sacred duty; or is it because we all feel guilty that we are leaving behind a legacy, a larger part of ourselves, this garden family,
to the terrorists' mercy; or is it to escape from the reality of the pain of exodus and turbulence which we all experience; or is it out of a sanguine hope that this love's labour and toil will never be futile but stay with us a fond memory of our bonds to this soil; or is it the faith in our tenacity that each time we faced the exodus, five times in our history, we staged an honourable re-entry?

Srinagar - 30 April 1990

Section II
Exodus and Exile

A Hundred Kilometre Tunnel of Fear

First of May, nineteen ninety, we sneak out of home in the blanket of night, we drive, huddled together-the whole family, idols and icons, images and framed photographs of deities and ancestors, some prized letters, books and clothes and a clod of mother earth-cutting through the valley along a hundred kilometre tunnel of fear.

We drive, breaths suspended,
lips sealed,
ears cocked,
hands on our breasts, trying to muffle our hearts that flutter in unison with the pistons of the engine; our telescoped gaze shutting off the chasing phantoms and focussed straight ahead without once looking back till we cross the Banihal pass, as the dawn breaks into light, into freedom,

into life.

Banihal, Kashmir - 1 May 1990

Lamentation

Seated aloft the hill how lonely you feel, Lord Shankara, while your hapless devotees, victims of the word, the sword and the gun, flee in terror yet once again.

How dry and parched you must be as there is none to massage thee with sandalwood and ghee, wash you in potfuls of milk and rosewater and weave petal patterns on your body.

There is not a sound of the chants that would resound of your votaries going round, and an eerie silence reigns where hymns once regaled, the bells chimed, the conchs hailed.

The breeze no longer wafts the incense nor do a hundred flames leap in cosmic dance, O, where is the touch of faithful foreheads, of passionate hands that caressed thee!

the sky a dull dreary haze, O, where is the lingering mist that your feet did kiss, where the cool breeze that fanned your brow, where the myriad clouds that sailed in salute in the deep blue vault above!

The heart cries in pain as I seek you here in vain in this hot desert plain.
The Aravelli is a poor consolation and remote from the Himalayas, the thistle, thornbush, and the wild vine a pitiful imitation of the chinar and the pine.

Try as hard as I may to sculpt you in stone and clay, the lingam slips further from my clumsy grasp and all my muse and meditation is of no avail to bring you anywhere within my mind's pale.

All that we treasure now is a vision of the past as the future, dim and dismal, is getting irretrievably lost while the present is a plaint deep within struggling to reach your distant ears and a picture of pathos which has failed to bestir you to open your Third Eye, a call of distress from your deserted devotees cast in the tempest of Time.

Delhi - 10 June 1990

The Burning Pyre

Since the Pandits arrived there have been long queues waiting for their turn to go up to the pyre.
Young and old,
male and female,
robust and frail, they are here without fail and the fire in the funeral pyre has hardly ceased this whole year.

The bodies keep waiting not that there is a dearth here of shroud or firewood, but a family priest for the final rites is so hard to get,
and at other times the corpses have to bide a whole day for the final adieu from their kith and kin, scattered as they are, arriving by bus and train, from near and far.

Wonder why there is this rush to go on the pyre?
Besides other things it does appear that it is the heat they cannot bear, and the sun here has burnt them up much before the fire on the pyre.

Jammu - September 1990

Identity

I left behind my identity when I was forced to flee and I need to prove my pedigree while I am here as a refugee.

I possess neither the ration card nor my school diploma nor the state subject certificate nor the voters list-my own, or of my family.

My status is under question, my identity suspect, for I am unable to adduce any documents or evidence or proof that I and my ancestors have lived in my motherland for five thousand years.

There are three hundred and fifty thousand here who could vouch for me but their testimony is null and void for they, like me, roam without identity.

Who am I, oft do I ask myself,

and others too, but a reply is hard to come by.

Jammu - December 1990

To Kashmir

Many are your daughters and sons who patiently sit through this wintry wilderness, awaiting the end of the long night.
Elsewhere, their kin wander, homeless, in many cities and towns waiting to be let back into the paradise.
Some trickle out of the shadows to the freedom beyond, bearing tales of your wounds and the muffled whisper of conspirators.
The wails of the victims of the gun are a part of your profound sorrow, the silence of the majority your undying shame.

There may yet be hope in the forbearance of your singed forests, the tranquillity of your soiled streams, and the loftiness of your weeping mountains – mute witness to your tragedy.

Jammu - January 1991

Twin Shame

They tore me from the lap of my motherland, threw me out of my home, usurped my estate and forced me into exile, because I belonged to a faith different from theirs.
Now perchance when they meet me I cannot fathom why, much as I would like to greet them like in the days gone by, neither can I accost them nor look them straight in the eye.
I melt with the twin shame of the victim who failed to defend himself and of the tormentors who felt no remorse at the betrayal of the trust that was reposed in them.

Jammu - 1 March 1991

Dried Offerings

A middle-aged woman keeps eyeing the bougainvillaea in my lawn as she passes along the walkway on her way to the temple, every day.

She lingers for a moment, one day, her eyes alight at the exuberance and she attempts to pick some flowers but fails to reach the wall from where they overhang in gay abandon.
She pauses, peeps and opens the gate, furtively advances towards the luxuriant bush and plucks them tenderly, one by one.

She is hardly done when she catches me spying from inside the house.
She falters, her colour fades, the flowers fall from her hand and blow with the morning breeze.

I come out of the house and smile a nod of assurance as she fumbles for words,
'All my life I offered flowers, fresh, fragrant and brimful, but now exiled and pauperised to please my angry God.

How can he ever forgive me this transgression, this sin?’

‘Like you, I am an exile, a tenant in this house, and these flowers a gift of god, as much mine as yours.

Take as many as you please, God cannot get angry with his own devotee who has not lost faith in him even in such adversity.’

She quickly gathers the flowers scattered on the ground and fumbles in her apron pouch for a small bundle which she tenderly unties for me to see.

‘This is all I carried with me when in a fearful hurry we were forced to flee.
I offer with all humility this humble token of whatever worth it may be.
Take it, it will please me.’

I gather in my hands her touching gift of love-dried rose petals, greyish white, picked nearly a year before that one could hardly tell but for the sweet tinge of nostalgia and devotion so strong that perchance may please my lord as I adorn him with this prized offering.

Jammu - 16 April 1991

Dole

Here a 'migrant' stands in a queue in this blazing afternoon sun for his monthly allocation-three hundred and seventy five rupees, a kilo of sugar, two of wheat, ten and a half of stale rice, and a litre of kerosene.

He has gone through fire and hell to establish his credential as a bona fide refugee from the terror-smitten valley, and every quarter or half yearly he is directed to produce evidence and fresh documentationaffidavits, recent photographs-to back up his identification.
Yet, invariably,
he has to part with a chunk of his relief and ration as a little gratification to the greedy officials in charge of the distribution.

And yonder in that prison is detained a terrorist, euphemistically called a militant, who receives four fifty a month; milk, mutton and eggs to boot his daily share of cereal; menus of his taste to suit; and an unlimited supply of water; playground and a prayer-hall, toiletry, and laundry-overseen and monitored regularly by human rights groups and many a visiting dignitary from the country and abroad.

And to boost the prisoner's morale are the many directives from the court to the administration and the jail to uphold the mandatory standard for his convenience and comfort.

Asks his victim, the 'migrant',
'Why don't I turn a militant, pick up a gun and surrender, if only for a better deal for food, amenities and shelter?
The prison at Kote is a safer haven than the dungeon at Muthi, more promise in being a militant than a wretched refugee.'

Jammu - July 1991

Camp School

In the wild outskirts of the city, on a barren piece of land at Muthi, five tattered tents each twelve feet by twenty, flapping in the wind, holding tenuously, make our school for a hundred and thirty.

The only furniture or upholstery is a bare blackboard, solitary, rough and ridged and rickety, that refuses to be writ upon with any chalk, coloured or white, hard, soft or powdery.

The 'migrant' teachers try their best with words, gestures and pantomime but often leave the class in disgust as the wind blows hot, the sun peeps through or the rains seep in to flood the school and the skin smarts and burns with the 'loo'.

But that doesn't dampen our spirits in this veritable laboratory where the briar and bush is our botany, the insects and worms our zoology, the sand and stones our geology, the elements our physics and chemistry, mother nature our library and we ourselves the history.

Ours is not just a camp school but a mini open university.

Jammu - 15 August 1991

The First Right to Forcible Seizure

I am a refugee from Kashmir, having been forced to abdicate and take flight.

No sooner had I left than my house was plundered, my kindly neighbour informs.
Disembowelled one by one of all its contents-furniture, fittings, fixtures-right under his nose.
'They would kill me if I intervened,' he explains.

Mr. X from somewhere downtown has moved into my house, removed my nameplate from the door and affixed his own, so says my good neighbour.
He can stand it no more, he is biting his nails, tearing his innocent heart out, as he now repents for having demurred and not being the first to occupy my house.

To be fair to the good Samaritan he never had an eye on my house but having shared a common boundary, he argues,

hadn't he the right
the first right, to the forcible seizure of my house?

Jammu - 26 December 1991

Testimony

Who will bear testimony to my identity when the bits and pieces of evidence-the ration card and the municipal certificate, the passport and the driving license, the revenue records and the land papers-have all been inundated in the flood of violence, and human evidence either unavailable or inadmissible, unless it were possible for my abandoned house where I lived and loved and dreamt, or the lonely chinar nearby that often its breeze lent, or the lovelorn birds that of a morning flew in for the grain, or the sulking dog that never barked in vain, or the deserted lanes that I traversed every day, or the temple in ruin where I would worship and pray – one or all of them-to speak up one day and vouchsafe to the identity of a Kashmiri Pandit?

Jammu - 24 May 1992

A Space to Die

'Your father is sinking day by day.
Why don't you change your doctor, say?
The refugee medics will take their time to grasp the afflictions of this clime.
A phanda may help, or a mantra till you seek out Dr Gandotra.'

I had no choice but soon to call the celebrated physician before nightfall but father grew from bad to worse, enfeebled, stuporous unable to nurse.

'If all the measures fail to revive, your patient may not long survive.
In view of his critical state you better move before it is too late.
I can allow a few days grace till you find another place, but no mishaps here in my residence, no mourning, no impertinence.'

I rushed back to my own doctor as the condition deteriorated from hour to hour.
'Pray prolong his life a few days till I shift to an alternate place.
Some shots, some freak remedies, a little breather, a slender lease.'

Off I went from door to door to rent a space just five by four, where father may rest in peace awhile ere Yama takes him from exile, to where he wishes for ever to lie in his native place, so glad to die.

Jammu - June 1992

Drought

While elsewhere in the city water tanks overflow callously and the life-fluid goes down the drain the refugee camps at Muthi face a scarcity.

In spite of incessant rains their taps run dry for the fifth successive day while their dear departed wait patiently for oblations of water, this being the Pitra Paksha, the moonless Ashvin fortnight, so sacred to their memory.

The dead will have to persevere and go thirsty for now and wait until the next year for the shradda ceremony as there is not even a drop for the living here.

Jammu - 1 September 1992

Lovesick

Like the parched earth in the summer of Indian plains waiting for the first shower of rains we look forward to your arrival and count on every moment of your company here with us in our exile.
Your mother rails at the suggestion that some sick or needy may seek your consultation, and she would not let go even a minute of your proximity, for like a devotee she likes to have her god to herself completely.
There cannot be, in her view, anybody more sick or needy, if you understand what lovesickness in exile means, when there is nothing else to fall back upon.

Jammu - January 1993

Ode to an Amaltas

You showered blossoms each day.
Like rain they poured down my way-soft petals, gossamer gay-that I patiently swept away, lest the devotees, when they come to pray, tread, trample and scatter away, this sacred floral tribute you pay to my lord, night and day.

Fresh flowers rained down every day in yellow grandeur all the way, again did I sweep them away and a third time each passing day, as you poured your heart away in pure devotion day by day.

'Stop awhile if you may, my cup is full', I prayed one day and this prayer of mine, curse nay, so readily back did you repay as the blossoms thinned each day, the flowers finally vanished away, the leaves fell down and faded away, the sparrow, dove and the jay one by one flew away and by the following month of May the body slowly went to decay.

The devotees were scared away,
'the curse, the curse,' they were heard to say,
'who brought it on? Let us chase him away, blasphemer, religious-runaway.' Should I open my bosom and betray my petition to the lord that fateful day that I was slowly wasting away sweeping the blossoms night and day?
Or should I believe what some others say as the details are given away of that ominous day in May when in foolish fervour, if I may, the devotees had a field day as cement, concrete and marble-inlay filled where they dug away the soft, warm and fertile clay that held your roots, O! Amaltas gay.

A corpse now stands in the way where your majesty once held sway and poured fresh petals each day on pilgrims coming all the way to the lord, their homage to pay.

Jammu - 1 May 1993

Saga of the Student

A bus skids off the road, hurtles twenty feet down a gorge, bang into a boulder.
Three instant deaths,
four fractured skulls, five flail chests,
a score broken bones, bruises, gashes galore.

Who are the victims?
Worn out and wasted, battered and bedevilled, depressed and distressed, they are the Pandit students, Brahmin boys treated as pariahs, refugees in their own land.

Snatched from the bosom of their motherland, forced into exile in their teens, they grow up in tents and tenements.
Segregated into 'camp' schools, few graduate to college level while most drop out as heartless mandarins of education, remote-controlling their destiny, deliberately harass and procrastinate admissions, examinations, and results, as three years of curriculum drag on to six or seven, while graduation fades into a distant dream.

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantala Jammu

Desperation drives the helpless youth, in search of their rights, from schools to secretaries to satraps, from classrooms to courts, street rallies to hunger strikes to face batons, handcuffs and jails, as every other method fails.

This is the tragic saga of innocent boys and girls, victims of a conspiracy where the militant and the bureaucrat, the police, politician and the prosecutor, have ganged up against them, and not to be left behind accidents readily join the grind.

Jammu - March 1994

Arda Shankara

Up the Roop Nagar hill there resides Arda Shankara in an open temple, a half lingam of grey golden-brown stone basking under the open sky, away from the hue and cry.

A Gujjar nomad, they say, in his heyday of idol breaking frenzy axed the lingam, and from its bosom, as it split into two unequal halves, flowed a torrent of blood.
The bigger half is our Arda Shankara atop the hill.

Nobody knows for certain about the other half.
The Gujjar rustic, there is a belief, carried it along and came to grief.

The Arda Shankara that reigns from this hill to bless his people is not a common idol of splintered stone nor a mere half-god, nor a maimed lord, but matchless in his grace divine, with a human face.

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalab Jammu

Unwittingly the iconoclast seized by fanatic rage sculptured a beautiful lord, the unique Arda Shankara, whom we worship for his wholesome benevolence, and not out of vengeance, because an ignorant mortal raised his axe.

Jammu - 16 September 1994

Funeral of a Monkey

'Ram Nam Sat Hai', resounds in the air, the procession moving through the streets-a pier adorned with buntings and saffron flags carrying the mortal remains of a monkey.

The pallbearers take slow measured steps, a dozen urchins in the vanguard dance in frenzy to the tune of a tragic film song, the more venerable form the rear, and others beating drums, tolling bells, as the crowd jostles and swells toward the pyre, each one eager to lend a helping shoulder.

'Ram Nam Sat Hai,' the solemn refrain rises above the din as the procession takes a turn toward the Hanuman temple for the blessings of the monkey god.

Not far from the temple, on the wayside, lies an abandoned corpse half shrouded in dirty white, mourned by a moth-eaten dog; a flock of ravens in their black apparel and a swarm of buzzing flies complete the funeral crowd; this being the death of an unknown mortal, not that of a monkey, the incarnation of Hanuman but of man, the offspring of Mammon.

Lucknow - 10 January 1995

Devotion Gone Overboard

In this pilgrim city there is a unique celebrity, an ancient peepul tree chosen for worship by many a devotee.

In a deed of devotion, a sweeping show of piety, and possibly in memory of spouses and sons, the zealous ones flagged the earth around the tree with grey and white marble stones.

Easy in their tread they circumambulate the tree on this shining marble stone, which, unknown to them, slowly strangulates, snuffs the air out of its roots, saps it dry and starves it of sustenance.

Curious pilgrims throng in ever-increasing numbers and marvel how long budless, leafless and sterile the tree stands as the bark peels off, the brittle twigs break and fungus and moss overtake.

But that does not slacken their adoration nor fervour as they adorn the tree with iron bells and light bulbs that hang from its enfeebled limbs, and make use of the hollows for their banners and flags, and on the sagging shoulders mount a loudspeaker to beckon the faithful and the believer.

Their devotion unflagging they anoint the trunk daily with sindhoor, saffron and sandalwood, burn incense and sticks of resin, and chanting with passion move earthen lamps in a sinuous motion and wash and mop with ardour this marble stone around the tree.

This revered peepul has to hold on and stand as long as it can as they embellish it with wish-knots of many-hued threads.
It dare not let them down and their faith disown.

Jammu - 20 February 1995

Invocation

O! Teg Bahadur, preceptor, guru, guide, saviour of our ancestors, we offer our obeisance in everlasting gratitude for your deed sublime.

Even angels are jealous of your sacrifice supreme, not for your own kin or community nor region nor religion but for a tyrannised people of faraway climes who sought your help.

O compassionate one, true crusader of rights, in an unprecedented act of courage you laid down your life to salvage our oppressed ancestors from persecution and conversion, from flight and extinction.

O immortal soul, worship-worthy Teg, we crave your reincarnation as Aurangzeb surfaces yet again in so many forms, at so many places in our sacred land with appetite whetted evermore by the blood of Tapilo, Premi, Prana Ganjoo, Lassa Kaul, Raina and hundreds of innocent souls.

O blessed spirit reverend guru, we seek your intercession once again, for deliverance from the deadly triumvirate of armed insurgents, scheming bureaucrats and conniving politicians-perpetrators of crimes against our race.

Jammu - March 1995

Kashmir – Lust for Savagery

Mere threats are but a thing of the past calumny, abuse something to last physical assault a mere routine loot and arson a common sport kidnapping a happy pastime extortion and rape a staple diet pistols and guns an inane sight plain murder a tame dish RDX and bombs something to relish.

The eyes seek a gory scene more tantalising, never before seen of bodies hacked, sawed, nailed eyes gouged out, ears sliced tongues chopped off, noses levelled joints twisted, ligaments torn bones crushed to rubble and sand hair wrenched from its roots skin pinched, burnt, peeled throats slashed, heads severed bellies ripped open, genitals snipped the viscera thrown to hungry dogs and the remains urinated and spat upon to put to shame beast and demon.

The heart craves more violent death many a death for every breath a bomb blast in a busy bazaar bodies blown to bits and shreds limbs, torsos, faces and heads raining down from the sky here, there, low and high blood flowing down the drains and nothing human that remains.

Jammu - September 1995

Paush Amavasya Night

There is nothing as serene and quiet as the Paush Amavasya night while on your climb to your rendezvous with the lord up the hill.

On this cloudless, faultless night the stars lean low to touch your brow as they come out in formations, galaxies, clusters, constellations, the whole treasure trove, vying with each other
to make a reverential bow.

The hills around you, one and all, in trance-like embrace rise and fall, the bushes dissolve in the hush of night, the last of the birds flits home to roost, and angels lead you by the hand on your onward upward march.

Wrongly has the Arnavasya night been dreaded and decried and unfair allusions made to this fifteenth night of the moonless fortnight with ungainliness and fright when it stands out to epitomise the supreme lunar sacrifice as she obliterates herself so the stars may shine their brightest and the best on this cosmic tryst.

And it is not without reason that the legendary Yaksha chooses Paush Amavasya night for his yearly earthly trip to feast on a dinner of rice, radish and raw fish in the tranquil starlight, and offer you a chance bright to snatch his cap if you might and secure it under a millstone, for then and then alone, and for as long as it remains there, fortune will smile on its heir.

Only the Paush Amavasya night offers this opportunity bright to transform a dark night into a beneficent sight,
only the Paush Amavasya night.

Jammu - December 1995

Frankenstein Monster

Why don't you let me be and leave me to my fate, why follow me here in exile, my ex-mate?

During the peak of exodus when I was on the run you came to me and lackadaisically advised me to stay on but added that you yourself were so afraid of the gun and hardly in a position to stop the killers nor anyone.

While you adopted this ruse rather nonchalantly, I was given to understand that you had joined, albeit clandestinely, those forces let loose and arraigned against me.

Having thus contrived and forced me to flee you also fuelled a rumour in the manner of a busy bee that I had renounced everything and so had thousands of others, in a mass hysteria of wanderlust, wilfully forsaken the paradise-our brothers, sisters and others-our homes, hearths and habitation of five thousand years!

Alas! to your horror now when you find yourself in a terrible bind as your own kith and kin set upon you colour-blind, it does seem my foreboding today rings loud and true that the monster you helped create one day verily would consume you.

Now you follow me in exile, and appease your curiosity awhile, to look at my barren state, compare your fate with mine, to share with me a moment and possibly give free vent to your choked sentiment in the freedom of this refugee tent.

I beseech you, my friend, either let me be or speak of anything to me except about the madness that made me flee.

Jammu - December 1995

Journey Into the Land of the Exiled

Arrival-1

Here I am now on this last reluctant stage of my journey of love.
For long have I stayed away from here, as destruction raged, dealt deathly blows to community and pride.
Dignity and trust suffered a thousand cuts.
Disgust and distaste filled us; fear and vacillation held complete sway.

Has the primeval beast of ignorance and folly paused in its rampage?
Will desecration cease?
As I arrive with hope, and with your beckoning what will I see around me here?
I ponder this awhile as I wait for you now.

Arrival-2

Vainly I look for faces, shapes and spaces, anything that will unlock joys of yesteryears or just the memories Humble dwellings which light with the laughter of children's games; sounds and songs of Spring;

chinars' summer shelter, Autumn's colours;
the crunching of leaves; winter welcomed with snow fights and snowmen, as kahva and kangris keep us warm.
But there is only a silence vast and widespread, profound sadness permeates all as I wait for you now.

Arrival-3

I see no folk around, neighbours nor kinsmen, traders nor artisans.
Gone are the narrow winding lanes where children loved to play truant; silent are the playing fields where sprains were sustained in contests and matches from 'kabaddi' to cricket.

What is this sterile stillness surrounding these damaged dwellings?
Weeds overtaking this vast wilderness.
The city is fractured and 'free'
as I wait for you now.

Arrival-4

I wait for you now amidst these ruins of a once beautiful land, hallowed over centuries, graced by saints and Sufis.
Where can I find them to solicit and seek their blessings again?

Am I too late?
Or, with all landmarks gone, have I lost my way?
Have I come to a different land?
Who will come and find me before it is too late?
I can't stand this silence;
this moonscape frightens me.
To keep despair at bay I remember meanwhile those recent stages of this graduated journey.
Brief, loveable sojourns, in other cities amongst the young and the old.
In houses and bazaars I tasted once more the joys of welcome, and loving farewell, listened to stories of struggles, of survival in sorrow, deprivation and desolation, the meetings with the 'migrants,' exiles in their own land, charming characters, sharing freely forever their lives and their loves.

Their smiling faces sustain me as I wait for you now.

Australia - January, 1996

On Your Arrival

Ever since you wrote about your intended visit we prayed and hoped it would come off well.
We waited with bated breath, drank often and drank deep the dreams of reunion, now that it was to be away from home, in exile.
We scoured places to visit, surveyed walking trails, discussed menus to suit your taste, mowed the lawn,
trimmed the bushes, planted new saplings and cajoled them to flower in time to welcome you after six long years.

Six years of the acme of our life, spent in the anguish of exile, over half a decade of rootlessness, of hatred and intolerance, of bloodletting and mindless violence, of people tortured and killed, and a whole community banished, of kith and kin dying before time of disease and damnation.

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalab Jammu

And when you did arrive we suppressed our sighs and snuffed our cries, brushed our agonies aside, lest they pollute the joy you carried on your wings.
We wore smiles wide and would not permit even a shadow of the pain to flit between us lest it blemish the bliss of reunion.
We would not let you carry the burden of those images back with you.

Jammu - January 1996

Status Change

My friend and neighbour of yore comes to me here in exile and exhorts me to visit my abode erstwhile, whatever little of it has withstood the militants' depredations.

He invites me to stay in his house where from I can look at my battered home and take stock of the prevailing state
of my homeland
and, in the bargain, make a pilgrimage to the temple on top of the Shankaracharya hill.

He well remembers that in days gone by before exile was forced on me I would climb the hill every morning to pay salutations to my lord.

The greatest tragedy of exile, it dawns on me now, is that the deity within my daily reach ded into a remote pilgrimage, has receded into a remote pilgrimage, my own house become a relic of the past, my homeland an alien place, and my status of a tourist at best.

Jammu - June 1996

Promises

Oft I hear loud promises that return to the homeland with honour and dignity is but a matter of days; that my house would be rebuilt, my annexed lands reclaimed and restored, my status in my job retained, the temples of my gods consecrated again, and whatever losses compensated.

While promises go on piling up and not one gets fulfilled I wonder who will reverse the clock of seven years and restore lost childhoods, recover youth that slipped into middle age, bring dear ones,
who died prematurely of distress and distraction, back to life; make up for lost years of homage to the deities out there, and catch up with time that cannot wait for my return.

Jammu - September 1996

P. S. O

I am a P. S. O.
A personal security officer.
An officer on paper, but in practice a vassal of the one that I secure.

I have to be vigilant night and day,
and move at his whim, follow him like a shadow from his house into the car, office or bazaar, mosque or a walking trail, public function or a recreational locale.

He flaunts me shamelessly as a status symbol, while I sniff around like a highbred hound and keep in readiness to throw myself in and safeguard my charge from abuse and assault.

We P. S. Os are a fast growing breed since the terrorists' creed engulfed my country,

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalab Jammu

and every minister and secretary or an official of any consequence seeks to fortify his security with a large posse of police and us.

But not uncommonly, my charge happens to be the very fountainhead of militancy who, having had his fill of loot and kill, has abdicated finally and surrendered to the army.

Not only has he been absolved of all crimes of insurgency but also accorded the status of having formally joined the socio-political mainstream!

His ex-mates and collaborators now charge him and upbraid for being a dangerous renegade and seek ways and means to avenge his treachery.

And that is where I come in handy to insulate him from his own cult,

and from all fear

from himself, and from those whom he used to hold so very near and dear.

Jammu - September 1996

Dyed in the Same Colour

We are being told that terrorism is on the wane and that most local 'boys' have surrendered or been killed and that all that is left are the foreign mercenaries.

Frankly I never could tell one from the other for they all look alike in their battle -dress swagger, rough and tough and gruff, bearing beards, guns and grenades.
And they all act alike, be they our own Kashmiris, Pakis, Arabs, Sudanese or the battle-hardened Afghanis.

Even in death when they get killed in encounters or accidents or in internecine wars and are shown lined up like sausages for the TV news-cast or in the daily newspapers, they all look alike-
dyed in the same colour of their own blood and the blood of their innocent victims.

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalab Jammu

Jammu - September 1996

26 January 1997

You amaze me, my country that not only you grant immunity to a dreaded Ghazi who spawned the insurgency, conspired and took up arms against you, looted, burned and raped and gunned down innocent denizens, with impunity-but also accord him the privilege and the highest honour to take the salute today, in the Republic Day parade right in this borough here, so near to where his victims shiver in the refugee tents.

Jammu - 26 January 1997

Sangrampora

O secluded Sangrampora the sight of seven bodies of your seven proud sons shrouded in white stands as a scathing testimony to the sacrilege against all that is human and a severe indictment of the savagery let loose by senseless people who shame mankind and aim to smother sane voice and sweep away all traces of civilisation from our sacred land; for your brave sons chose to hold on, vainly though, now it seems,
to their roots, in the face of a violent hurricane of religious frenzy to keep alive the heritage of five thousand years
in the valley.

Jammu - 25 March 1997

The Religion of Killers

At Sangrampora they picked seven sleeping men from their homes in the stealth of night, seven Pandits seventeen to seventy from five families, gleefully shot them dead out in the open before they fled.

They spared the females and the children, spared their lives for the small price of being widowed and orphaned!

Who dares say now that the militants wielding the gun don't have a religion?

Jammu - 27 March 1997

The Colour of Blood

Why this weeping and wailing and beating of chests, mass rallies and protests, just because seven Pandits of remote Sangrampora were done to death?
Haven't Muslims too been maimed and killed, why then does nobody mourn them?
Is their blood white, is it cheap,
is it trite?

I have no answer why nowadays they do not mourn their dead in the valley accursed, nor why,
if they took to violence and chose to kill people of my faith, they, as well, turned their guns on their own daughters and sons.
But I know that their blood, which thirsts for more blood, cannot but be hot and red, and surely not cheap

if it buys them martyrdom in a heap.

But I grieve and cry as bitterly for them as for the seven and many others whose precious lives were snuffed out in a betrayal without parallel.

After all while I am a victim of their violent design they themselves are their own victims, such alas!

being destiny's wild whims.

Jammu - 10 April 1997

Premium on Death

My visiting friend from the valley tells me that people over there are in a hurry to meet their doom for there is a premium on death.

Each of its victims, whether in crossfire or in custody, or through terrorist killings, leaves behind a legacy of one hundred thousand in cash, a job for the next of kin, a life-time pension for the widow, and for the orphans a maintenance allowance till they come of age.

My friend says that the stakes for death have been further raised for the policemen that die in action, from one to five hundred thousand and there is always that additional bonus of another hundred thousand from the Central Government as an ex-gratia relief!

There is a vested interest in death these days in my lost paradise, so my friend says.

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalab Jammu

Jammu - 18 October 1997

Death Threat

He has a death threat (confessed an old one) from a Mujahid youth (his own son) trigger-happy and armed with a gun who swore one day to shoot him down not only because he was old and therefore of no use to him or anyone, and for his views on the cult of the gun-(so repugnant to the son), but more on account of the fair compensation which violent death nowadays brings to the next of kin.

Jammu - November 1997

Wandhama

Sangrampora, ten months back, was a mere rehearsal, a consolation, but here in Wandhama it is total extermination-not just seven males but without discrimination of age, sex or position, the whole Pandit population and their gods without exception.

Could there have been a more austere occasion than the devotional Shabe-qadar night when the whole Muslim population was out in the mosques for a night-long prayer and recitation while their Pandit neighbours joined the Muslim incantation with their death throes and supplication as lethal ammunition was being pumped into their frames and formation, right under the nose of the administration?

No orphans this time, no heirs, no widows no widowers, no gods nor their worshippers; twenty-three victims, without survivors, crying to the Indian nation on this foggy morning of the 48th Republic Day celebration for their final rites and cremation.

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantala Jammu

All that remains of the Pandits is a dark cloud in the Wandhama sky hovering like a huge question mark: what was that terrible compulsion that drove the fanatics to pump eighteen bullets into the tender constitution of a tiny kid that had just begun its locomotion when a single would have done?

Jammu - 26 January 1998

Exile

Exile is like being shipwrecked, torn from your roots, shorn of your identity, thrown into destinations unknown.

Exile is a leveller.
It has no place for position, pedigree, power or pelf.
It humbles all.

Exile is an existential crisis, a crisis of faith, of values, a challenge to human spirit that may submerge and sink to the nethermost depths or soar to new heights in the rekindling of the urge to survive.

Exile is a penance, a cleansing process of the soul, a seeking of new vistas, new values, new relationships, a new purpose in life.

Exile is like being on a railway platform waiting for the train that takes you back to your roots, a journey of self-rediscovery drawing you inevitably to your past, your identity,

your gods,
your motherland.

Jammu - February 1998

Need for an Identity

As the world moves into the golden age of what we call the global village, and national boundaries slowly disappear to merge into a new order of a single government, a world democracy,
isn't it anachronistic, this assertion of my identity?

A Kashmiri Pandit now in exile but labelled a migrant for having been uprooted, why do I stake my claim as an internally displaced or a refugee in my own country?
Why seek a minority status as a minority Hindu in a Muslim majority state of a Hindu majority India?

A jigsaw puzzle, I agree, the legacy of a race memory, a generational déjà vu of persecution and violation, an ongoing trauma of six centuries, a sacred injunction of exodus-stricken ancestors for redemption, for salvation.

Yes I will need my identity so long as these walls between caste and community, between faiths and religions, between races and nations, are not pulled down completely, and a true world order defined in all sincerity.

Jammu - March 1998

Section III
The Call of Roots

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalab Jammu

Sanctum Sanctorum

Let them break me into a million bits, these fanatic nitwits,
I will rise, from each bit a whole again;
each pebble, stone or shell that you pick from the foothill or the bed of yonder stream and install on a pedestal with unflinching faith, shall transform into a shrine, where I shall materialise; for I am that which none can abduct, nor defile, nor destroy.

The zealot and the iconoclast may have a long reach and access to the furthest nook, but never ever,
to my safest, surest sanctum, the heart of a true devotee.

Jammu - September 1990

Homeland

We live to share your grief and die to suffer your agony as they ravage you and defile and drive us into exile.

In wilderness we wander sans our souls that we left behind, nothing do our ears hear but your heart-rending groans and all that our eyes see are the wounds that bleed thee.

Our memories have fled us, what lingers is your ignominy.
Now our feet only seek the paths that lead us back to thee.
Our speech ends in one refrain:
Homeland
as we take in hand the mighty pen to fight the terrorist gun.

Dearer to us than all the worlds we pledge to reclaim thee as our spirit craves the land of our birth and the lips thirst to kiss the earth
of that sacred land, our homeland.

Jammu - 16 December 1991

The Spirit Does Not Accept Exile

Why doesn't the first flush of dawn titillate the numbed senses into wakefulness and initiate me to the call of duty?

Why don't the myriad temples that abound here in exile evoke fervour and devotion and the intensity and passion of a votary?

Why don't the ringing of bells the chanting of bhajans, the music of drums and cymbals, draw me out of my muse to rush for the daily prayer?

Why don't the Trikuta and the Pirpanjal beckon me to heights where pure joy abides as did the Mahadev and the Shankaracharya hill?

Why doesn't the Tawi, as it flows in the fullness of rain skirting this temple city, hold me spellbound as did the Vitasta.

Why doesn't the sun when it rises and sets here draw the mantra
'Om bhoor bhuva suvab' spontaneously from my lips?

Why doesn't the blanket of night envelop my tired soul in the peaceful bliss of dreamful sleep?

Why, though I eat and dress and live and go about my chores as before, does the spirit refuse to soar as the present in exile changes places with the past and the mind drifts and roams in the length and breadth of my home of yore?

Jammu - 18 September 1992

Floral Adoration

In times gone by when there was relative peace and plenty and the happiness of security back in my homeland, often did I visit you to offer my prayers, and a floral tribute to your grace.

I owned a garden then, yet the flowers that I brought you were not all my own.
I would pick some that were on the decay and others from the wild on the way-common flowers and ferns, green twigs and pine coneswhile I kept behind like the selfish giant, the most fragrant and the best at my own behest.
You accepted my offerings with majestic grace.

Now in the thralldom of exile and forced into tenancy I often seek you and offer flowers like before.
I pinch them from my landlord's lawn early, before the dawn or from the public park away from people's gaze, or buy them sometimes from the flower seller at your door.

You accept them with your benevolent grace as in the days of yore.

I am dying to return, my all-knowing, my forgiving lord, to my dear native land, my garden to reclaim, so I could offer you the choicest and the best, flowers grown with my toil.
I know, you will again accept them with your eternal grace.

Jammu - 4 January 1993

Magnolia

Whilst yet a snow-white bud, seated like a lingam half hidden from mortal eye, the secret of your grandeur deftly settles on the senses.
As you slowly swell and unfold, whipped up by your aroma, the hormones burst the floodgates, puffed passions peaking from delirium to convulsions to trance to the ultimate bliss.

The embers of quenched passion char you from white to rust and powder you to ash as you lay bare your bosom at the altar of love.

Jammu - June 1994

RE-CREATION

Re-creation

Lord, I have been banished and so has been my whole race forcibly torn away from you and thrown into the wilderness of exile.
Like nomads we struggle for life through wastelands and barren fields and face the battering rain, the pounding hail,
the howling, blinding dust storms, the bone-chilling wintry nights, the sweltering, stenching, drenching summer, in snake pits and scorpion dens, stalked by baying hounds, under the prying gaze of vultures, as spiders, ants and mosquitoes join the death dance.

What sustains us is our faith and your mighty presence within, replenished by the legacy that we carried with us-your icons, idols, images-and our endeavours to re-create our lost paradise, by raising replicas of the abodes of your manifold avatarsthe temples of Zeystha and Zala, Raginya and Sharika,

Lalla and Rupa and the all pervading Lord Shiva.

Jammu - 21 January 1993

Celestial Bridge

I never saw a rainbow as big, broad and high as here in the wilderness of exile across the earth and sky; a seven-hued bridge over Pirpanjal and Trikuta across the Tawi to the sacred Vitasta, a superhighway on the biosphere leading from exile here to the motherland over there.

While the rampaging militants that have taken over the valley are busy burning bridges and the bridges between people have fallen apart in a breach of faith, this rainbow here,
this celestial bridge, beyond the reach of the predator, is a divine intercession, and a providential link between man and man, between the distanced and estranged, between home and exile.

Jammu - 3 September 1995

Proxy Prayer

When you were so near I hardly ever bothered to step out and enter your majestic realm for a prayer;
nor did I care ever to let the breeze inside my home that breathed of you in full gear; nor once bother my eyes to peer at you, my dear when you were manifest, benevolent at your best.
I was immersed all through in my own care and cheer as far from you as you were near.

Now
when I am banished from there and out of bounds from anywhere, there is a great upsurge inside me, everywhere, a craving to merge with you and be near.

Till you call me back to your altar,
I seek you my lord through a proxy prayer by an erstwhile friend, a worthy seer who, when he returns to his lair in the city of Srinagar, will pay you homage and my prayer, which please accept, my forgiving lord, my dearest dear.

Jammu - 6 February 1996

Reconciliation

A refugee camp in Jammu.

A Muslim from the valley visits his erstwhile Pandit neighbour.

Dear Pandit, dear brother, dear friend, dear neighbour, in leaving the accursed valley you really proved the wiser.
You only lost your hearth and home we our honour and shame; you left behind your estate and farm our pride hath come to eternal harm; you escaped from fear and terror we are condemned to unspeakable horror, and while you give tongue to your thoughts ours are tied in tedious knots and truth is a casualty with us as we speak in the militants' vein against what our consciences ordain.

You live in a torn, tattered tent yet your head is not bent while ours are stooped in servitude to the gun-toting multitude, the cordon-and-search and the crackdown is a slur to our honour, we must own, but worse still the swoop on our privacy and the lust for meals, money, and maids by the marauding boys with AIDS, flouting all canons of religion, destroying the movement ere it has begun.

It is now a free-for-all, no longer the holy Jihad, but a class war my pal, and those who would sweep our floor-blackens, bootleggers and more-carry the gun and order us about as paupers of yesterday are today's lords with real clout, the true Mujahid, alas no more, but Arabs and Sudanis Pakis and Afghanis.

In your flight from that hell your intellect precedes you well as ours goes pell-mell; and the values we shared fled with you our traditions and culture too; and while the valley burns in hatred its heritage fades from the face of the earth.
Our freedom has been snatched away in the frenzy that holds sway.
As the foolish struggle comes to naught we rue the Azadi that we sought.

Can we find a way out, can we together, dear Pandit, break ground and turn the wheel around?

Jammu - 11 December 1996

The Kindling

If proof were needed didn't this sixth exodus in six centuries clinch it that intolerance will stay and I will have to find my way and settle away from my homeland.

Yes, I am fatigued six times over and desire nothing better than to be left in peace here in my temporary shelter.

Yet the answer to that riddle kept evading me all these years as to why my ancestors returned to the valley each time they were driven out till this wizened old man out from there came to seek me the other day.
He held my hands in his feeble yet warm grip as he sat on the couch and, before I could proceed, thrust a gift in my hands of roasted wheat flour and baked paddy seeds, and turning his palms towards the sky invoked his Allah to return me and mine with dignity and honour to my homeland where we could live together, people of his faith and mine, for ever after.

Ever since, the fragrance and flavour of that traditional gift, tinged with the nostalgia
of five thousand years
tingles my primordial urge to return to my roots, as my resolve grows every day even with the full knowledge that I may have to face yet another exodus.

Jammu - 8 March 1997

Quantum Leap

Having rudely stabbed me seven winters ago you come here seeking me in exile, wanting to hold my hands, embrace me tight, left and right.

You are dying to open up and speak about the insanity of those seven years and shed rivers of red-tinged tears, tears of suffering, mine and yours.

I hold back but only for a moment, as my vow to break from you goes to pieces and my reticence is flung to the winds when I look into your liquid eyes and read the mute language of regret, remorse, repentance.
We rush into each others' arms almost in a trance.

You have said
all that need be spoken, and bridged the gulf of seven years in that quantum leap right into my bosom, from where all is forgotten and forgiven.

For it was not you that stabbed me but a new creed of violence born of hatred and intolerance that failed to convert you just as your violent deed seven years back, failed to convert me.

Jammu - 12 April 1997

Time

Ah Time, grown weary racing along all the time, pray pause a little to catch your breath, give your sinews some rest and look around, and give me time to rush back to gather my childhood and bring along my youth that I left behind in my race to catch up with you.

Time,
dear time,
tarry awhile, give yourself a break and me a reprieve.

Jammu - June 1997

Mauj Kasheer

Two men helped her into my consulting chamber 'What is her name?' I asked.
'Mother.'
'From where?'
'Kashmir.'
Sure she was Mauj Kasheer attired in a pheron, long and loose and embroidered, and a head-gear high,
the Qasaba, quaint and tottering well nigh.
'What ails thee, mother?' I asked.
'The pangs of separation, my son.
You left us behind, to be abused, debased and undone, and for my old eyes to witness the loot and plunder, blood, gore and murder.' She raised her quivering fingers frosted with the chill of countless winters and clasped my hand as if in pincers.
'Eight years is a long time and I can wait no more; I came to this faraway clime to discharge the debt of motherhood,' and she raised her Qasaba and tossed it at my feet,

'Here, i beseech you, come back to your mother pray do.'

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalab Jammu

Mauj Kasheer has come to her exiled son, how long can I wait to return?

Jammu - December 1997

What Unites Us

Why does it need bloodshed to bring us together, separated that we are like the banks of a river, the river of blood that is our own, fed by streams of blood flowing down the centuries?
Our blood.

Blood is our bond,
it is our heritage,
we are the blood.
Yet we drift apart like the banks, and the enemy strikes and spills more blood.
Our blood.

We fight apart, but wounded we fall together in the same battlefield.
We die together, or if we survive we lie together in the same ward.
Maimed, we recover only to limp back to our separate paths, waiting for another tragedy to unite us again.

Jammu - February 1998

Nausheen

Nausheen, the new snowfall, born of the snow-dreams of exile – of cosy huddles and cuddles in kangri-warmed beddings; of water-chestnuts baked on iron stoves; of long-boots, pherons and pull-down caps; of fish and beans and rice – you come to us virginal white, the first snowfall in eight years of a parched life, landing so soft so quiet on our withered memories in exile.

Nausheen, the angel from the skies, you bring the fragrance of a forgotten winter's delight, after an eight-year-long sultry night – a morning of divine sight, supernal, serene, white, soft, smiling and bright.

Nausheen, the first snowfall after eight snowless Shivratri, you arrive to replenish the denuded peaks of soul and to water the parched marrow of spirit.
Nausheen,
the offspring of exiled dreams, born to the children of snow in the snowless deserts of exile you come to us – the promise, the resurrection and the life, the continuum, and the generational thrust in our march back to the snowy roots.

Alabama, USA - 19 July 1998

Pride of a Nation

As Sammy Sosa catches up with McGwire, the champion on the 65th home run, the jubilant citizens of Dominican-forgetting the destruction and ruin that Georges has brought upon this brave sporting nation-throng the streets in a celebration to honour their illustrious son.

The pride of a people in their great son who, through his sporting feat, elevates them from depression and helps boost their determination to face the scourge and fight on, reminds me of my exiled situation, and reinforces my conviction that no sacrifice or renunciation is too great to reclaim my nation.

Alabama USA - 25 September 1998

It is Now

You ask me to wait till the evening for my prayer, now that the morn is over, the temple door shut, the echo of bells far away, and urgent the call of the day.

I would wait till the evening and beyond, for my whole life, if only I could break this journey into the unknown.
For while I move on I may not traverse this path again and feel ever sorry that your audience was denied to an itinerant votary.

I could wait, no doubt,
till the evening and beyond,
into eternity,
if I knew the spontaneity, the ardour and urgency of my devotion, as of now, would remain unabated.

The intensity of a flower unfolding itself from its bud will not stay the same a moment later.

It is a moment which is now, one moment that captures the essence of my being as I come to offer it.

Open thine portals, accept me as I am,
now.

There is no recompense for unrequited love.

Jammu - October 1998

ADITYA

Aditya

When dreams become reality when visions materialise when prayers are answered when desires get fulfilled you arrive Aditya, my grandchild, in our exile, shining like the rising sun from behind a veil of clouds defying all predictions of time, place and gender to set your own calendar.

Your arrive, promised one, with a mission to drive away ignorance and to still all violence, to bring peace back in place and restore us our space in our native land,
our homeland.

Chicago, USA - 21 June 1999

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalab Jammu

Glossary

- Aditya – the sun
Amavasya – 15th day of the dark fortnight Arda – half
Ashvin – seventh month in the lunar calendar Azadi – freedom
Batta – Kashmiri Hindu, also called Kashmiri Pandit, (acronym KP)
Batten – Pandit female Bhajan – devotional song Cordon-and-search – an operation to flush out the terrorists in which the security forces throw a cordon around an area and seal exit routes before the search Darshana – to manifest Dale Batta – derogatory epithet for a KP - an euphemism for a coward and a weakling Georges – name of a hurricane Ghazi – a Muslim fighter against non-Muslims Hizeb – Hizeb-ul-mujahideen, a terrorist group Inshallah – with the will of god Jagmohan – two-time governor of J&K State Jansangh – a former political party espousing Hindu nationalism
Jihad – holy war
Kangri – fire pot to keep one warm in winter Kehva – Kashmiri tea Kheerbhawani – incarnation of goddess at Tulamulla Lailahi-illalah – there is but one God Lingam – the Hindu symbol of Siva – phallic symbol

Loo – hot wind that blows in the summer in Indian planes

KP – Kashmiri Pandit (Kashmiri Hindu)

McGwire – US baseball record holder

Mauj Kasheer – mother Kashmir

Migrant – exiled Kashmiri Pandit

Movement – the secessionist/freedom movement

Mujahid – holy warrior

Nizame Mustafa – the Muslim Utopia

Nausheen – The new (first) snowfall of the season

Octagon – the octagonal spring of Kheerbhawani

Paush – the 9th month in the lunar calendar

Phanda – traditional occult remedy for illness

Pitra paksha – ancestral fortnight

Qasaba – a Muslim female head dress in Kashmir

RSS – a Hindu socio-cultural organisation

Sammy Sosa – Dominican baseball player

Shradda – death anniversary

Siva – lord Shiva, also Shankara

Vena – a wild shrub held sacred and used as an offering

Yaksha – Yach in Kashmiri, a supernatural being

Yama – God of death

Zeystha – incarnation of goddess at the foothills of Mt.
Mahadev in Srinagar

Zindabad – long live

Gandhi Memorial College of Education Bantalab Jammu

Of Gods, Men & Militants

Dr K L Chowdhury

Kashmir - the land of snow-capped mountains and lush green valleys; the golden land of breath-taking beauty - torn asunder by the intermittent booming of guns; the exotic flower-carpeted expanses dyed a deep, dull red. This is how the author sees his beloved homeland and his cries of anguish echo through these pages:

We live to share your grief and die to suffer your agony

Indeed, the tumult of the exiled Kashmiri Pandits can never be stilled as long as the guns refuse to be silenced and brother fights brother with a hatred that is fanned by vested interests.

With pain and nostalgia writ large in every heart-rending poem, there still emerges a glimmer of hope that peace will prevail and his misguided brethren will lay down their arms and resolve to study war no more.

Cover design: Indigo Communications

India Rs.165

UK £4.99 US $7.50

ISBN 81 7662 116 1

CC-0. In the Public Domain. Digitized by eGangotri Minerva Press (India) Private Ltd New Delhi Miami London Sydney